Global equities climbed in Q2 as economic data generally came in better than expected. The fund saw a positive absolute return, underperforming its benchmark.

Performance

The fund finished behind its benchmark, with outperformance in Emerging Markets and Pacific ex Japan outweighed by underperformance in Europe.

Market Background

Global equities climbed in Q2 as economic data generally came in better than expected.

Outlook

We remain of the view that equities could see further volatility in the months ahead as global economic growth continues to be impacted by the lingering effects of high inflation and higher rates. We therefore continue to position the portfolio in a balanced manner, albeit with a defensive tilt, and a beta of just below one.

From a sector perspective, we are overweight Utilities and Consumer Staples, and underweight Materials, Energy and Financials. The spluttering economic recovery in China could weigh on certain commodity prices, while risks are growing for banks, which are coming under increasing political pressure to offer higher rates on their deposits. This is happening just as non-performing loans are likely to increase.

Thematically, we continue to have exposure to the Defence and Luxury sectors. During times of high inflation, it is clearly beneficial to own businesses that possess durable pricing power. Few sectors, if any, can match the true champions of the Luxury space in this regard. Finally, we own defensive growth names such as Reckitt Benckiser, CVS and Experian.

Portfolio Positioning

Over the quarter we bought Reckitt Benckiser, which we believe has now derated materially relative to its earnings potential. Similarly, we bought ASML as it has seen a pronounced derating relative to other players in the semiconductor space. We see ASML as more defensive than peers, given its order backlog, earnings visibility and technological barriers to entry. We therefore saw the correction as a good opportunity to enter the stock.

Another purchase was Cadeler, a leading provider of marine-based renewable energy solutions. The company specialises in the development, construction, and operation of offshore wind farms and related infrastructure. The market for offshore wind farm installation vessels is exceptionally tight and is likely to remain so for some time as these ships take years to build. We see significant synergies on both the cost and revenue side from Cadeler's acquisition of rival Eneti. Indeed, because Cadeler has a market leading reputation, it will likely be able to extract higher day rates from Eneti's fleet. Moreover, the network economics of having a larger fleet should mean less downtime for each vessel as they travel from job-to-job.

Conversely, we sold Samsung Electronics as earnings have disappointed yet the stock is near an all-time high.

We also sold Saint Gobain and Stellantis as part of efforts to reduce cyclicity in the portfolio.

Merck was cut as the stock was becoming increasing catalyst-light in our view.

Finally, we took some profits in Centrica and Heineken.

Stocks

Below we highlight a major winner and a major loser:

Renesas

Renesas is one of the world's largest producers of semiconductors for mobile phones and automotive applications, although its management team has actively repositioned the portfolio through strategic acquisitions, expanding its relevance to a broader customer base and increasing the company's total addressable market. Notably, acquisitions such as Dialog have enabled Renesas to establish a foothold in higher-value market segments, thereby reducing its reliance on cyclical end markets. However, the primary driver behind Renesas' strong recent stock performance was its starting valuation, which was exceptionally low. At the beginning of the year, the company was trading at just over 3x EV/EBITDA and a mid-single digit P/E multiple, while peers were trading on low-double digit multiples of earnings and nearly double the multiple on an EV/EBITDA basis. This discount was due primarily to the previous management team's mishandling of the last semiconductor cycle, when excessive inventories resulted in substantial write-downs and a complete erosion of profitability in 2018. Thankfully, the new management team has demonstrated astute inventory management and has achieved an increase in gross margins to over 50%, which has acted as a catalyst for the recent re-rating. We have started to take profits in the position.

DSM

DSM is a global science-based company known for its innovative solutions in nutrition, health, and sustainable living. The shares struggled in part due to weakness in DSM's ingredients and vitamins businesses. Crucially, we believe that management have now re-based expectations for this year, and have acted decisively by announcing a large restructuring of the vitamins business, which should lead to substantial cost savings from 2025. Following the announcement of this restructuring, the shares have begun to rally.

Highlights

- The fund finished behind its benchmark, with outperformance in Emerging Markets and Pacific ex Japan outweighed by underperformance in Europe.
- Waste management company Sabesp performed well as investors began to price in Brazilian rate cuts.
- Nexans released results that were ahead of guidance, but the internals of the results were seen as lower quality as the business mix has temporarily shifted away from the High Voltage
